

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. Formerly, I was annoyed especially around the dinner hour with all sorts of offers. However popular telephone solicitation may be, it is just wise consumer self-protection to never agree to anything over the phone. If one is intrigued by an offer, he should ask the caller to send written information. Time and again when I asked for this the caller said none was available.

In the era since Indiana's Telephone Privacy law became effective my time at home has been relaxed and uninterrupted. During this time I changed addresses and my enrollment in the no call list had to be renewed. Sure enough, calls invaded during this interim.

Indiana's law has been very effective. I would not want the FCC to pre-empt it or enable any additional categories of vendors to be allowed to call.
